LIST OF PUBLISHED SOIL SURVEYS

The U.S. Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with state agricultural experiment stations and other federal and state agencies, has been making soil surveys and publishing them since 1899. These surveys furnish soil maps and interpretations needed in giving technical assistance to farmers and ranchers, in guiding other decisions about soil selection, use, and management, in planning research and disseminating the results of the research, and they are used in educational programs about soil use and conservation. Sound scientific and technical standards are used in a nationwide system of soil classification, nomenclature, interpretation, and publication.

Soil classification has improved as our knowledge about soils and their potential uses has increased. As agriculture has become more technical, a proper fit between the kind of soil and the combination of practices used has become more critical. Because of this, soils bearing the same names are more narrowly defined in recent surveys than in the older ones.

When soil survey work began in 1899 little was known about the soils of the United States. Since then a great deal has been learned, methods have been improved, and the results of the surveys are more accurate and detailed. For planning farms, engineering structures, parks, urban developments, and other uses of land, the recent published soil surveys are more useful. The older surveys can be of considerable assistance for many users, but their maps are more general than those in recent surveys and some of the interpretations need to be updated.

Published soil surveys contain, in addition to soil maps, general information about the agriculture and climate of the area and descriptions of each kind of soil. They include a discussion of the formation and classification of the soils in the area and also soil laboratory data when available.

Soil surveys published since 1957 contain many different kinds of interpretations for each of the different soils mapped in the area. The kinds of interpretations included in these recent surveys vary with the needs of the area, but the following interpretations are in most of them: Estimated yields of the common agricultural crops under defined levels of management; land-capability interpretations, soil-woodland interpretations, rangeland interpretations, engineering uses of soils, interpretations for community planning, suitability of the soil for drainage and irrigation, suitability of the soil for wildlife and for recreation.

Most of the soil surveys published since 1957 contain soil maps printed on a photomosaic base. The usual map scale is 1:24,000, 1:20,000 or 1:15,840, depending on the needs of the area.

This publication lists those surveys that have been published by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. A few state agencies also publish surveys but, except for eleven in Illinois, one in Pennsylvania, five in South Dakota, and two in Wisconsin, these are not included in this list.

A soil survey published by the U.S. Department of Agriculture that is still in print can be obtained in one of the following ways:

> Land users in the area surveyed and professional workers who have use for the survey can obtain a free copy from the state or local office of the Soil Conservation Service, from their county agent, or from their congressman. Many libraries keep published soil surveys on file for reference. Also, soil conservation district offices and county agricultural extension offices have copies of local soil surveys that can be used for reference.

Most published soil surveys cover one or more counties and are so named. Where the survey covers only a part of one or more counties, the word "area" is a part of the name. The date in the list is the year the field work was completed for surveys made from 1899 to 1936; from 1937 on it is the year the publication was issued.

Soil surveys are being completed and published at a rapid rate, so this list is always at least a little out of date. For information on the current status of a soil survey not listed herein, inquiry should be made to the State Conservationist, Soil Conservation Service, in the appropriate state. Addresses of State Conservationists are listed on the back of this page.
